Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1909 edition. Excerpt: . . . microscope. When the men who look through microscopes disagree, what do you believe I was quibbling about material progress. No, I was not. He said I misquoted. The substitution of the correct quotation does not detract from my original statement. What has the correction of the quotation to do with the argument If you have knowledge, and some one else has the process and the machinery you are helpless. But suppose you have the knowledge, the process and the machinery, and I hold the land, what will you do The mill owner had knowledge, process, and machinery, and was helpless. That was a physical fact. It was not in the realm of non-physical civilization. Here was the greatest mechanical construction of its kind, a man of invention and power surrounded by other men of skill with full ownership of the place, unmortgaged and unhampered. But he did not own land that held the raw material which he must use to make his knowledge and process and machinery of any avail, and those who did could levy tribute. Evolution and growth may have some sort of synonomous meaning within certain limits. Devolution and decay may have a similarity of meaning in certain cases, but growth and decay are different. It is this tendency to use words in place of expressing ideas--not always, but often--that I criticize. If you go to Colorado and get fat, it is on account of altitude. If you get thin, altitude...
