If this was the case should we not also expect to have cross infections in the south end of the building as well as in the north end where all the crosses occurred? The same argument might be applied to the intern. It is quite reasonable for us to expect that those who are the most constantly in touch with the patients are the most likely to carry infection. These are the nurses and interns. The cross infections cannot be traced to the students because during their visits to the hospital several individuals are assigned to watch every movement they make. It is noteworthy that the students make few breaks in technic. It is also not impossible that the staff, I include myself, may have been responsible for a cross infection. I think, however, that this is less likely for reasons given before. That cross infections occurred in no way disproves the practicability of the theory upon which we have been working. It does on the other hand show the danger we are constantly subjected to from our dependence upon the human equation. We have learned much. The most important thing we have learned is that it is not every one who can master this simple technic. Some nurses cannot compass it. As some individuals perfectly sound mentally and...
